houses computer systems and various networking, storage, and other related equipment. Data centers may, for example, house the computers and equipment used to service the computers of a large organization such as a telecommunications service provider or a major online retailer. Data centers typically provide numerous benefits to organizations that use them. For example, data centers can improve an organization's overall ability to respond to surges in computing demand. They can also provide increased reliability, and can reduce energy costs and operational expenses (such as the costs of real estate, heating, ventilating and air conditioning). Some data centers are large enough that they include their own power systems, which can include large power generation facilities, such as a fossil fuel power plants, nuclear power plants, hydroelectric power plants, and solar power plants. These power plants may be strategically located and configured to provide power to the data center and to deliver power to the power usage equipment (PUE) of the organization.
