A workflow that is biased towards the Nikon D500 and D3s, but practically works on all cameras, it should be noted that the auto-shadow/highlights-removal does require some fine adjustment settings. As you can see, the main categories are the same, but there are also new categories for "Asset Pro" and "Design". The latter one is very interesting and, I think, will be a popular place for many users. Photo functionality is neatly divided into three parts - Image, Adjustments and Web in one package. I like it, because we often get confused about what's in the Web category, it's a new concept for us. As always, the basic functions are set by default; the "save as" feature is the simplest to use, I like its simplicity. A very nice detailed description of the different Color Spaces can be found here if you want to know more about them. If you're in need of some inspiration for your next photo assignment, check out the Design section - it has really helpful tips on working with many different color spaces, plus the new web-based assets section with lots of wonderful tools to find the templates you want to work on. The basic idea of a gradient is that if you drag it, it's pretty easy to see where you're going, just like a border (or even a bar) would be useful in this case. What I would like to see, though, is that the panel stays where it is at all times. I cannot figure out how to place it anywhere else, and there are no options available for that, as this is yet another "light" departure from traditional Photoshop.

This is complicated and requires the use of specialized case-specific equipment, but does raise the possibility that we could see an update to the Touch Bar, perhaps even an update 'dock'? In addition to Touch Bar, there are significant design level functionality changes proposed, many of which are potentially game-changers for product usability. We are discussing this with Apple and we will keep you updated as we learn more. To get a sneak preview of what we are discussing behind the scenes, please check out our series of product bulletins - the first installment covers Graphics Design. As you can see from the graphic we will be addressing the state of the current user in graphics design as well as design future propelled by some of the entirely new features in the forthcoming tools.
